Thanks to Chopper and Raunchy for a fabulously soggy hash from Gutter Tor. I was told as we approached that the bog was a massive floater. It certainly smelled like it, and before most of us knew which way to go we were up to our bits and bobs in it.

Biff felt seasick as the ground lurched beneath us. Racy wet her knickers as she made her way through the bogginess shouting "follow the tarts!" in the general direction of Russ Abbot and Cannon Fodder. Piston Broke was soon waist deep, and there was floundering in all directions by both shorts and longs as dust was sought. Top hashing.

Naughty Boy took a swim at the finish, to 'sooth his muscles'. There was talk that he had in fact been caught short in that way that you might be on the beach, when you wander into to sea and make a pretence of swimming around. It could happen to anyone; after all, he's not the Messiah....

On Down to the Walkhampton Inn where there was witnessed an act of true friendship as Scupper Sucker, after Piston Broke's dunking, lent him his holey pants. There was rumour that they were still warm. Bless.

Sally found her hash name when she gave her food order as 'Sally, I have a normal name'. Now there's tempting providence....

...After a stream of hash name orders, her supper came out with the shout of 'chips for Salty'. And so Salty Dog was born.

"It can never be too deep or too wet", she remarked on being asked about her first soggy hash.

Many happy returns to Kharzi who told of the fabulous views that might've been had on his Birthday Run to Jamaica Inn on Sunday...

His possie got lost in the mist and reckon they must've covered 8 miles of foggy bogginess, without being able to see any more than a few metres ahead, before they were done.
