I'm sure there will come a day where I'm supposed to write a hash mag and put actual reminders on my phone about it so I don't forget about it until the last minute, but it's definitely not today because as usual I only remembered to write this at the last minute again like last time. I guess the mags I write wouldn't be the same if I didn't desperately make them up on the day they're supposed to be handed out and they're usually well received by the other hashers, other than the GM who I laid into in my last one, so I must be doing something right.

Talking of trashing our beloved GM, after the amount of trashing I did to her good name the last time I threw one of these together and the injuries I sustained from her after we got back to our flat, I have decided to change tactics and keep any criticisms to myself. This idea was totally of my own choosing and has nothing at all to do with why I wear a knee brace while running now. Since I can't fill space with slanderous comments this time I'll have to put more effort into deciphering my notes that I made at the pub last week, though I at least know that I can still make a better mag than Choppers last attempt as he set the bar so low I've already surpassed his efforts inside of two paragraphs.

Onto the actual hash which was set expertly by Naughty Boy and Omen and was stated beforehand to be nice and muddy and full of rivers and they weren't kidding about that but at least my shoes were already wet so I didn't mind the ice-cold rivers as much as I should have. I decided to go on the longs for the hash and didn't regret my decision even when we had to make our way up one of the longer hill sections I've come across. The longs did manage to get lost for a little bit but if you don't get lost on some part of a hash then what's the point in the first place? I've been told it builds character as well so there's always that.

I don't remember much of the actual hash as I've had a fair few ciders between now and then but it certainly lived up the idea of a long hash as I didn't make it back to the car until after a full hour and my legs were hurting for a few days afterwards which is always the sign of a proper run. Onto the pub then which me and Chopper made it to and totally did not get lost on the way to.

I was told in the pub that the hash we had run would be good training for the Grizzly next year, which in my mind makes my decision not to have anything to do with that the correct one. I will however look forward to seeing our wonderful GM attempt this trial in 2018 while I look one from the side-lines. I should have taken more notes at the pub but was distracted by a large burger and a pint as usual but I recall that we had some guests over from Singapore and that Spike did an excellent job filling in for our absent GM, who I have it on good authority was doing something very important that evening instead. On the issue of not having any notes for a hash mag, I was told to just dig an old one out of the archives and just change some of the names around but I will be saving that tactic for when I really need it.

As we near the end of the year and the nights draw in and the temperature drops we should all remember that it's not all so bad as we have the mince pie run coming up and a possible Christmas Hash as well. We also have a hash set on New Year's Day which I look forward to attempting while being massively hungover. Though the new year does bring new worries such as who will end up on the committee next year, however I'm confident that I will escape for another year and that's not the actual reason I've reversed my comments on our GM at all...honest.

That's all I can think of even though I'm sure to have forgotten some vital information and as always please ignore any grammatical errors that I have made, even though I will end up hearing about them in detail later.
