Words for Run 1948 - Orienteering/Gluten Free Hash

Last week was a unorthodox orienteering style hash. Being flour free it was totally unaffected by the heavy rain throughout the day.

For those not in the know - the word orienteering comes from the Swedish word 'orientera', which means 'to become hopelessly lost'.

I turned up to the London Inn, Horrabridge slightly more dazed and confused than usual due to the brewery slipping into its Christmas production mode, forcing me into waking up much before I'd like to. Expecting to be able to turn off my brain and follow other people around the countryside I thought I would be able to soldier through. Unfortunately though the Hares had other ideas.

Instead, turning up on a moderately damp but not yet raining evening we were instructed to form groups of 3-4 and handed out laminated maps entitled 'Bills Conundrum'. These maps were complete with a hit list of 12 locations throughout Horrabridge/Devon where letters had been secreted beforehand. The challenge was to get to enough locations as possible within the hour so that an intelligent group of hashers would be able to spell something.

This provided an interesting study into the dynamics of a hash split up. There were some very different strategies from different groups; Some elected to further split up to cover more ground, others relied on their athleticism. While some of the more canny groups were seen trading their letters at junctions and crossroads.

I've noticed from previous hash mag writers mistakes that criticizing the GM generally doesn't go well for the scribe.....

This paragraph is unrelated to the previous sentence but an anonymous person whose name will not be committed to print was seen along with Deep Throat giving up the hunt almost immediately after encountering a hill and going to play on the swings. Luckily kind hearted hashers took in Ginger Rogers after he was so cruelly abandoned by ~~Raunchy~~ his team.

Afterwards in the pub there were further antics which I have failed to record or remember sufficiently:

The correct answer for Bills conundrum was revealed.

A group was deemed to have won and got awarded a large box with a small amount of chocolate.

We sang Happy Birthday to Knashers

The chess players seemed overwhelmingly happy to see us.

Our GM awarded a down down due to someone criticizing her.....

We established how directions to Tavistock and Princetown should be described when arriving at the Yelverton roundabout from the Plymouth side. For future reference:
